

Misuse of Section 124

Why in news?

\n\n

A Tamil magazine editor was recently arrested under Section 124 of the IPC.

\n\n

What was the controversy?

\n\n

\n

- The arrest was based on a published report about Governor and his Secretary holding several meetings with an arrested assistant professor few months ago.
- The magazine based its report on this issue, not on a sting operation, but on police evidence.
- However, the Tamil Nadu Governor's office had complained to the police, seeking to book the editor under Section 124 of IPC.
- They cited that the offending articles express an "intention of inducing or compelling the Governor to refrain from exercising his lawful powers".
- Section 124 applies to assaulting high constitutional functionaries such as the President and the Governor with "an intent to compel or restrain the use of any lawful power".
- It was intended to cover cases where these functionaries are prevented from exercising their power through criminal force, attempts to overawe, or wrongful restraint.
- The offence shall be punished with 7 years imprisonment and shall also be liable to fine.

\n

- It is a Non-Bailable, Cognizable offence and not compoundable.

\n

\n\n

What was the wrongdoing?

\n\n

\n

- The Governor had also invoked Section 124 previously when a state party staged black flag demonstrations at sites where he held meetings with district-level officials.
- It is unlikely that a black flag demonstration can attempt to “overawe” the Governor in a manner that restrains his office from exercising power.
- Overawe would suggest the commission of an offence that poses a real danger to the exercise of authority.
- Hence, to extend the meaning of “overawe” to a mere protest or a work of journalism amounts to misuse of the intended provisions.
- In the recent case, the Metropolitan Magistrate in Chennai realising the absurdity of the prosecution’s case, declined to jail the accused editor.

\n\n

What are the precedences in this regard?

\n\n

\n

- A well-defined law has been laid down by the Supreme Court’s 1994 judgement in R Rajagopal vs State of Tamil Nadu, popularly known as the Auto Shankar case.
- According to that, public figures have to satisfy a very high threshold to claim privacy and the right to reputation for demanding prior restraint of a publication.
- Therefore, it would be very difficult for the governor in this case to demand prior restraint of the news article.
- Also, prior restraint has a chilling effect on press freedom, violating Articles 19(1) & 361A.

\n

- In contrast, in the Subramanian Swamy case, the apex court stated that a person's right to reputation takes precedence over the media's right to report.
\n
- Countries like US have recognised that the complainant of prior restraint must prove the presence of actual malice in order to proceed with a defamation suit against a media house.
\n
- But Indian courts are yet to adopt this standard.
\n

\n\n

What should have been done?

\n\n

- \n
- In a period of five years between 2011 and 2016, over 200 criminal defamation suits against a vast swathe of journalists and media houses for their criticism of governmental actions and policies.
\n
- The governor could have used other forms of legal redress available to him rather than going for this provision.
\n
- By citing them to seek registration of a Section 124 case against the magazine's Editor, journalists and employees, the Governor's office has only turned the spotlight on itself unnecessarily.
\n
- Hence, the governor could do himself a favour by withdrawing the complaint, since it is unlikely the TN police will take such a decision on its own.

Quick Facts

\n\n

Categories of Offences

\n\n

\n

- If an offence is cognizable, police has the authority to arrest the accused without a warrant and to start an investigation with or without the permission of a court.

\n

- Otherwise police does not have the authority to arrest the accused without a warrant and an investigation cannot be initiated without a court order.

\n

- If an offence is bailable, police has the authority to release the accused on bail on getting the defined surety amount along with a duly filled bail bond at the concerned police station.

\n

- Otherwise arrested person has to apply for bail before a magistrate or court

\n

- If an offence is compoundable, a compromise can be done between the accused and the victim, and a trial can be avoided.

\n

- Otherwise, no compromise is allowed between the accused and the victim except under certain situations, where the High Court or the Supreme Court have the authority for quashing a matter.
