

Undoing the Liquor Ban Verdict

What is the issue?

\n\n

\n

- In 2016, the Supreme Court ordered a countrywide ban on the sale of liquor along National and State Highways to check the “menace” of drunken driving.
- But subsequent appeals seeking exemption on various grounds has considerably diluted the essence of the original ruling.

How did the ruling evolve?

\n\n

\n

- High Courts of Tamil Nadu and Haryana had ruled for the removal of liquor shops along the national and state highways to avoid accidents.
- The respective state governments took the case to the Supreme Court, which heard these cases together and subsequently upheld the High Court orders.
- Additionally, restrictions that the liquor shops should not be accessible or visible from the National or State Highways was also placed.
- Hence, a stipulated distance of 500 metres from the outer edge of the highway was mandated, which caused the closure of multiple outlets throughout India.
- This ruling also saw some of the governments de-notifying state highways and declaring them as district roads to circumvent the liquor ban.
- While there are inherent dangers in declassifying highways, a case against this wasn't substantiated in the court as the states were within their rights to do so.

How has the verdict withered with time?

\n\n

\n

- Various Appeals - Subsequent to the original verdict, most states sought exemptions for highway stretches that fell within towns.

\n

- Based on Tamil Nadu government's plea - offset distance from the highway was relaxed from 500m to 220m in areas populated with over 20,000 people.

\n

- States like Sikkim argued that 82% of its area was forests, and 92% of liquor shops would have to be shut down if the order was to be implemented.

\n

- Hence, hilly states of Sikkim, Meghalaya, and Arunachal Pradesh were exempted from this rule, keeping in view their peculiar topography.

\n

- Kerala's Case - Kerala argued that its "geography and settlement pattern" was unique, and asked the court to consider the entire state as a "single city".

\n

- Notably, Kerala is a densely populated state, consisting of a large number of national and state highways within its narrow east-west spread.

\n

- Settlements in most parts of the state are continuous stretches with little infrastructure difference between urban and rural areas.

\n

- Also, as 30% of its land is forested and as its tourism dependent economy will take a hit if liquor ban is strictly enforced, Kerala made a strong case for itself.

\n

- Final Order - Ultimately, the courts comprehensively permitted liquor shops on highways if they fell within the municipal jurisdictions of a town or city.

\n

- Additionally, it was left to the states to decide whether to permit liquor sales on highways within panchayat limits.
